Answered March 27, 2015. Like Mike Mendis says "read:_" is used after an opaque phrase, jargon, or euphemism to describe frankly what is meant. It's usually sardonic or cynical. The person using the opaque phrase or jargon would not usually use the phrase "read:_" Instead, someone else referring to the document and analyzing it would use "read:_" to make the meaning of the document more clear in a non-formal way.

Start counting with the beads in the lower row. To count a digit, push one bead to the "up" position. "One" would be represented by pushing a single bead from the bottom row in the farthest column on the right to the "up" position, "two" by pushing two, etc. You'll find it easiest to use your thumb to move the beads in the top row, and your index finger to move the beads in the bottom row.
