There are two types of self-disclosure: verbal and nonverbal. We self-disclose verbally, for example, when we tell others about our thoughts, feelings, preferences, ambitions, hopes, and fears. And we disclose nonverbally through our body language, clothes, tattoos, jewelry, and any other clues we might give about our personalities and lives.

We would therefore encourage therapists to bear these what, when, why and how questions in mind whenever considering the use of TSD. In addition it is also worth thinking about when not to self-disclose as a therapist (e.g. when a negative consequence is possible or likely). For instance, when the TSD may: I invoke envy in a client (e.g.

Dealing with self-harm disclosures can be tricky. Here are some of our top tips when it comes to encouraging a young person to disclose about their self-harm.. Listen - allow the young person to take time to talk. There may be long silences as it's extremely hard to talk about, so don't fill the silence. Be honest and consistent - if your self harm policy says you have to tell your line manager, tell them.

To break the ice and start a smooth conversation, we make use of self-disclosure, which means providing information about ourselves. No one's asking us about personal stuff. However, we make use of it when we want to create a bond with the other person. Self-disclosure is considered a strategy because it's part of our social skills.

I found the article, 'Opening up to disclosure' by Anna Ruddle and Sarah Dilks (June 2015) a refreshing reminder of the complex issue of how much, if at all, a therapist might choose to reveal about themselves to a client. Of course, therapists self-disclose the minute a client walks into the consulting room. The therapist's wedding ring, for example, might have particular significance ...
